Field Trip

Making the most out of it.

Field trips can be more than just taking a bunch of pictures and sometimes seeing something new. In our club there is a unique opportunity to learn from other members and try new techniques. The trip to the Fire Museum, for example, was a lot more than a tripod and slow shutter speed exercise. We were facing the white balance challenge with dual light sources, the natural light (daylight through windows) and internal lighting (fluorescent and incandescent). And that was the easy part. The reflections in the display windows and in the chrome parts in the vehicles required a lot of attention to camera location and positioning of shades. Should we shoot with available light only or use flash or reflectors? A super wide-angle would be nice, like the 14 mm Nikon I am trying to convince myself that I really need.

Tip Of The Month:

How I miss my

For those still using film, just ignore this. For all the rest of us, here is help for those who miss the good old vivid colors of the Fuji Velvia slide film.

There is no way to replicate the slide colors on a print for all kinds of technical reasons that we will not get into here. We can get close with extensive work with Photoshop Channel Mix applied to adjustment layers. A lot of work and not very easy, so here is a plug-in program that can do the work for you. You might remember the presentation I gave on the Black & White Studio plug-in a few years ago. This is the same idea, a program for simulation of film colors and contrast. This time for both color and B/W. The program is Exposure 2 by Alien Skin. Their web site is www.alienskin.com. The current price is $249, not cheap, but if you are looking for powerful simulation capability and are getting tired of playing with the Channel Mixer, this might just be what you need.
